problem). Bottom line: For whatever illustrious or corrupt reasons were actually behind the abhorrence of the politicians at that time, the clean election was lost for the democratic system. Nothing more, and nothing less. What would have been the answer for the Roman Empire? Did anyone suggest that they should have held a more general plebiscite or akin to the plebiscite which was generally used in the ancient world? What the historians, and especially the Romans themselves, should have done is to study the Chinese example a bit more closely. In ancient Greece and Rome some form of a referendum was allowed. What the Romans seem to have done is to move away from the violent, expensive, popular regimes which were used to be by tyrants of the era. In China the referendum or plebiscite only allowed for the leader to reject the people if he had lost the confidence of the people. It did not afford any input from the people if the country was run according to merit. Many interesting stories and tidbits for History Buffs and will be interesting for anyone with a knowledge of history. Just a few quibbles on some terms as they are used.
