In my never-ending attempt to resolve this thread, let me try to reply to your other point first. The mini-debate that raged in the comments of the initial review got me thinking about this more. I've been ducking it for a while, but that's because I've never been happy with the way Lightroom worked. I didn't think it was possible to improve Lightroom, but I do now. I think of Lightroom as an application, and I think it has many useful features and always could - and should - be better. I've made one big attempt and that's Adobe Cocktail. That's more cosmetic editing, and it's geared toward making Lightroom work better. Size is one reason I've avoided adding features. It's hard enough to get people to realize that Lightroom is possible - not to mention free -without adding new features. I got an idea from a simple tool in Flash Builder, which let you see clearly how much memory your program was using. It said "ZOMG DA RESOURCE USED" followed by the number of megabytes of memory it used. I checked out how Adobe Cocktail does it, and it was a shock. If I'm using 1GB of memory, I can pretty much guarantee it's not Lightroom. I told my coworker, "I don't care if it's trying to get more features - I just want a new program that's easy to install and runs fast." I have a slow computer, too. By the way, the very silly test of updating all of a program every single time you install has been removed. I won't even show you a screenshot of that, it's too embarrassing. Just knows that it's gone.
