Professional workflows have yearned for the ability to automatically convert a JPEG to a PDF in Lightroom 2. Now Adobe has delivered just that, and it's the only option if you want to preserve an image as a PDF. The company also introduced the option to create a PDF based directly on the original and editable asset. A few months ago, I shared some thoughts about Lightroom 3 and how it might make some tasks easier. The latest betas for Lightroom 3 and Lightroom CC confirm that the software is being developed and refined (the new software lets you tag people directly in an image). As a person who uses Lightroom 2 for cataloguing images, I can appreciate needing to switch gears to work with more than one image, but it feels like a cost for the convenience of not having to switch from catalog to review to retouch. One of the things I like the most about Lightroom is that it will automatically pull down third-party collections from Getty Images and others. I dealt with it shortly after the program first appeared, and it's still possible to add or remove collections, but none of the current collections have a North American focus. Likewise, suppose you want to search for images based on where they were taken. Lightroom among other applications has that feature, but it's a major chore to use. Finally, Analog Style and Adjustment Layers give users the ability to apply each adjustment to an entire layer, instead of fiddling around with them manually. For example, you could move shadows and highlights to the background by creating an Adjustment Layer, then assigning them to the layer, and painting over the layer with a gradient. In addition, adjustment layers give you the full range of adjustments, so you can move shadows and highlights to the background or change other colours, for example. You can also create and hide adjustment layers. You can work with adjustment layers in several ways:

- You can also use adjustment layers to bring specific adjustments into focus instead of creating a whole new layer for each one. This is especially useful if you want a bunch of adjustments applied all at once. Choose Layer > New Adjustment Layer and follow the same steps you'd use to create a new layer.
- You can create adjustment layers for all the layers in a document. To do this, choose Window > Show Layers and check the box that says Convert to Adjustment Layer. A new dialog box will open, letting you choose the adjustment layer to create. You can also use adjustment layers to assign a different colour to a region of an image. Choose Edit > Adjustment Layers and a new window will open, allowing you to create a new adjustment layer. Hold your cursor in one region, and when the dialog box appears choose Fill->Fill Options and pick a custom colour.

The same process works for Gradient, Dropshadow, or other shadows and highlights.
