Adobe Photography, Lightroom 5 came with a big bang for our users who would like to change their workflow. You will set up your first project and open it for the new features yet to arrive. The interface (UI) could have been a little better. The sidebar panels are opened, the way teachers used to open the flap on a sketch book and flip through the page. Even the workspace will be dedicated to you, as you create. All your photos, your areas of interest and your edits will all be listed. You can click on the browser button and then click on a specific area. It's all done but it is not intuitive and you will find yourself spending a little bit of time finding your way around it. The new Lens functions make use of AI and are mechanical in nature, yet some of the functions are not immediately understandable. For example, if I want to apply one of the correct repair options to a specific image, I have to go into the dialog box, select Repair and then choose Standard Repair. In order to do that will take me to the default -10 and back to my image. So, let's walk through each element. You will first set up your first project. You will have a choice of the Ubuntu or Windows platform. If you choose the Windows version, you will have the option of installing the Adobe Developer Application and, as a developer, you will also have the option of choosing the Company Foundation Class API (Version 1.1 for developers).
