Fast, efficient, affordable: that's the big guns. If your graphics and imaging workflow can't run on OS X, macOS is a reasonable choice. But there are some warts that'll start hurting you at the end of this decade. Adobe Camera Raw lags behind compared to standalone versions of Photoshop, and its usability around RAW files is pretty awful. Although it's an excellent make-work product, Photoshop is still a better tool to process and edit raw files. More on that in the macOS review. Photoshop may never be more than just a powerful photo editor, but getting your photos into it is only getting more complicated. Photoshop has long acted as a testbed for digital imaging pipelines, and is now demonstrating some of the industry's best ideas as we build rawpix into the editing experience. It's now more than just rasterizing your image - it can process, intensify, and polarize it in ways that go beyond outputting raw data. Adobe Creative Cloud subscription pricing is based on how much you use, not how expensive your machine is. If you don't have a ton of memory or a nippy GPU, a subscription may be for you. The rest of us can order a single-user copy, and we'll save loads of money, and get unlimited resources no matter how big our library of images or how fast our memory is. Getting used to the features and cost structure may take some time, but it also means you'll always have access to the most comprehensive suite of design and editing tools available. Changing from Lightroom to Photoshop isn't going to be easy. You'll need to edit better, and Lightroom's modular framework has its merits. But it's harder to assess the range of available tools when you're just getting started, and you don't have your own archives of work. For beginners, that's a good problem to have, since the tools are becoming more powerful and more accessible all the time, and capable photographers are more likely to want to get started in Lightroom than Photoshop. Even if Lightroom is on your short list, check out the above. You can get a much clearer sense of what's available before you make any decisions.
